—As in this country, the predicted high tides occurred on the English coast a day earlier than they were anticipated. They were not very high, however, and very little damage was done. Large numbers of persons congregated on the Thames embankment and on the bridges to see the high tide, but it was only about a foot higher than ordinary spring

The gold speculators in New York, at the time of the recent panic, it is reported, attempted to draw General Horace Porter, the President's private secretary, into the plot, by informing him by telegraph on September 16th, that they had purchased half a million of gold on his account. On September 10th, General Porter wrote to the speculators that he had not authorized the purchase of gold and did not desire any.

A few nights since, as the night express on the New York Central Road was near Amsterdam, a baby, who was looking out of an open window, gave a spring, and in an instant fell mother's arms to the ground. The affrighted mother, without a thought of the danger, rushed to the door and leaped from the train. As soon as possible the cars were and "keys" of any required shape or patstopped, and bucked to the spot, where every tern can be fitted to them by the readers of one, expected to hearn of the fatal injury of newspapers, by resident invalids, and by traneither was hurt, except that the baby had a slight bruise on the side of the head. The mother stated that, as she saw the child go out of the window, her only thought was that she "wanted the baby."

A sub-committee of a school board not a thousand miles from Lynn were examining a class in a primary school. One of the committee untertook to sharpen up their wits by propounding the following question: "If I had a mince pic, and should give two-twelfths to John, two-twelfths to Isaac, two-twelfths to Harry, and should keep haif of the ple myself, what should there be left?" There was a profound study among the scholars; but finally one held up his hand as a signal that he was ready to answer. "Well, sir, what would there be left? Speak out loud, so that all can hear," said the committeeman. "The plate!" shouted the little fellow. The committeeman turned red in the face, while the other members roared aloud. That boy was excused from answering any more questions.

—Henry Rochefort, the bitter enemy of the Emperor Napoleon III, who is now residing in Brussels, where he has fied to avoid the consequences of a conviction for the libels contained in the Lanterne, has, in a letter signed by two hundred and thirtythree French Republicans, been invited to become a candidate for the Corps Legislatif in the First Electoral District of Paris. Rochefort at first declined, but, it is now re-ported, has changed his mind as to the propriety of becoming a member of an assem-bly destined, as he asserts, not to fight against, but to bury personal government. He says in his letter of acceptance that he is willing to assist, if permitted, in bearing the dead body to the grave, and that he will perform his duties in the Corps Legislatif in the hope that it may shortly become a convention to form a constitution. He also boasts, that during the June election riots he was present in Paris for three days without the knowledge of the head of the police, although three secret agents are constantly watching his move-

-That was an unfortunate yawn which spoiled the pleasure of a party of young men on Lake: Michigan last week. They salled into a beautiful little cove, and, having laid out a sumpluous repast, were sitting down to enjoy to when Mr. S., the wit of the party, caned back with wide-stretched jaws to enjoy tremendous gap ; when snap went his jaw aving sprung out of join with his mouth ppen to its widest extent. Le tried in vain to blose his jaw, looking wildly around upon his friends, who mistook his open mouth and

It was some time before his indistinct articulations could be understood, the party meanwhile roaring with laughter at the appearance When, finally, they became aware of the truth, their vision of a pleasant day vanished, they hastily bundled their traps and afflicted brother into the boat, took to their oars, and pulled twelve long miles to Munising. S. In the meantime sat in the stern sheets steering the boat, with distorted jaw, and the strong south wind blowing so freshly into his mouth as to make it necessary to stuff in a handkerchief to keep from being suffocated. Arriving at Munising a doctor was procured, and, with the help of several men, the unlucky jaw was put in place.

"The Swamp Angel."

The shrewdness of Mrs. Beecher Stowe in carrying on an attack is quite equal to that of General Joe Johnston in a retreat. She has an eye for a vantage ground as sharp as that which marked and mapped every announcements to be published at these rates | natural rampart and bulwark of mountain and forest and river from Chattanooga to Atlanta. The principles she follows we commend to the literary strategists of all countries and all future ages. It is the principle of the bombardment-known to military men from the beginning-but somewhat novel in literature: this principle-that to assail an adversary successfully you must take a position of offence where your enemy cannot get at you.

Such were Mrs. Stowe's tactics in the Uncle Tom controversy: She gathered isolated and abnormal facts and wove them into a sensational narrative. She had the novelist's liberty of giving what names she chose to the victim of the story, and, to further her main purposes, she selected the name of one of our most honored Southern statesmen, to drag in the mire. When she made the name of Legare the synonym of cruelty and oppression, she already prejudged the whole Southern question, and libelled its best defenders and noblest representatives. Nothing could be more dexterous. This sort of attack admits of no reply. When a character in fiction is so contructed as to awaken horror and detestation, the name given to that character itself becomes odious. Mrs. Stowe knew this very well. She took advantage of the circumstance. She gathered together the most piquant and extreme cases of outrage which had occurred on Red River plantations and other remote regions, whose fertility has invited men of broken character and broken fortunes and reckless adventure (as well as men of character and capital,) and represented this social chaos as a fair sample of life at the South. She erected a scene of thrilling horror-a Walpurgis night of outraged innocence and hellish glee, and enthroned in the midst of its tumult, of blood-stained virgins, of witches and of devils, a master fiend whom she named Legare. Such was the strategy of Mrs. Stowe in her campaign against Southern society. Uncle Tom's Cabin was erected on the principle of the "Swamp Angel;" it was distant, safe, dastardly, destructive and inaccessible.

Had not the world been hostile to the institutions of the South, so unfair a libel would have been denounced by honorable and generous spirits everywhere. The remarkable dramatic skill of the book would not have saved it from the condemnation due to its malignant unfairness. What would men think of a story, spicy with the flavor of Boston or New York police reports, with a Mrs. Stowe as the procuress, or a Mr. Beecher as the felon, around whom the most shocking details of the tragedy were grouped; what would they think of such a story if it were foisted upon the public as a just representation of the state of Northern society? Who would not protest against the malicious libel? To legitimize such travesties would be to enthrone falsehood, to sacrifice to sensation the fair fame of any country the novelist might chance to dislike, or of any institution, however sacred, which he sought to overthrow. Yet against such attacks the injured party is defenceless. So long as there is wrong doing in any country, and so long as the authority of any institution is liable to abuse, Uncle velling correspondents. The sport is as easy, as safe, and, let us add, as maguanimous, as the pelting of frogs in a pond.

Happily or unhappily, detraction grows by what it feeds on. No habit is so hard to break as that of confessing other people's sins. And so, Mrs. Stowe, baving used up the South, turns her attention- to England, and inflicts the deepest mortification and bst poignant anguish upon the family connection of her greatest modern poet. The same cold-blooded sagacity is displayed in this case as in the other. The crime she charges upon Byron is well nigh beyond the range of public discussion. The justification she adduces for the horrid and prurient revelation is the claim of friendship, and honor, and virtue. The counter testimony has, for the most part, either disappeared in the grave or been locked up in the memories of men bound under the most sacred obligations of secrecy. In the wild and wayward poems of Byron, especially in his dramas, and in the mystilications in which he delighted, there may be found plausible grounds for charging him with the wolation of any commandment in the decalogue. For he was as fond of sensation as Mrs. Stowe is, and went into the business not with the cool dexterity and financial aims of a bookmaker and magazinist, but with the reckless and rollicking humor of a spoiled child. And, finally, the beloved and honored lady, whose virtue is now assailed, has passed from the stage, leaving two daughters whom the modesty of sex would forbid to enter upon such a discussion. Mrs. Stowe ventures to go where they cannot. She has planted her cannon in an inaccessible swamp, and thence launches terror and death upon the defenceless homes of the Byron family.

After awhile the world will come to know Mrs. Stowe as well as we do. Nay, they are beginning to find out already what cre dit is due to her high-sounding pretensions. The plea that her attack upon Byron was required as a reply to the silly book of the Countess Giuccioli is simply absurd. Nobody attaches any importante to the praise of that pink of propriety. Yet the fat Italian eulogizing the English lord and poet who had supported herself and family, cramping her stubby, snuffy fingers for free of charge by all the railroads in the gaged in a task quite as honorable as if she had been insulting the affections and ruining the fair fame of his living relatives, and disturbing the ashes of his dead. There are some roles perhaps which even poor Giuccioli would scorn to play. They are the monopoly of modern philanthropists and reformers.

Cotton Spinning.

The condition of the cotton manufactures n this country and in Europe is the subject of earnest discussion on both sides of the Atlantic. England, France and the New England States of the American Union are alike discussing the best means of preventing a loss of their trade, and of securing themselves against disastrous competition.

In England, an enormous monied capital, acked by the whole power of the govern ment, is ready to be used in recovering the old markets or in forming new ones. And not a day too soon! The continent of Europe is far less dependent than formerly on the cotton goods of Manchester, and the American demand, in consequence of the increase in domestic manufactures, is steadily decreasing. Commercial treaties do not stop the gap. Take the treaty with France as an example, which treaty, while it secured the English a market for their coal, annihilated their silk manufactures. What is now proposed is nothing less than the removal of the entire cotton manufacture to India; to establish the factories there, and, by the aid of low prices, for labor as well as the raw material, to undersell both Euro pean and American manufacturers. In France, a similar scheme is under con sideration. There the proposition is to transfer the cotton factories from the northern de partments to the southern portion of the Em pire. During the last six months the Austrian port of Trieste has imported from Bombay twice as many bales as France received This gave rise to the suggestion to move the factories nearer to the supply of raw material and nearer to the seaboard. In both instances the principle is the same-to bring the cotton mill closer to the cotton port and cotton field.

A similar idea is beginning to attract attention in mechanical New England. The obvious truth that cotton can be procured and manufactured at a lower price in the South, where it is produced, than in the Northern factories, to which it is conveyed at great expense, is opening the eyes of the spinners. This has taken firm hold of the Southern mind, and New England must either move its mills down South, as England proposes to move the mills of Lanenster to India, or must submit to be driven out of the market by the produce of the Southern factories. Nearly one hundred million dollars is invested in cotton manufacturing establishments in the New England and Central States. This is the extent of the interest which is felt in the manufacturing progress of the South.

Notwithstanding the failure of Senator Sprague to lead the revolution in cotton spinning, of which he spoke so glibly, there is still a prospect that Northern capital and Northern machinery will gradually find their way to the South. It can, moreover, be shewn, we think, that the English spinners can use their surplus machinery here more profitably than in distant Hindostan. Upon the same continent they would find the raw material, the means of manufacturing, and a sufficient market -a market more hard to be satisfied as the broad plains of the West are made rich by the labors of the immigrant and the passage of the locomotive.

The South, in truth, holds the balance of power. It has not been found practicable to replace the American staple, though sacks of English gold have been scattered broadcast among the cotton planters of India. Old King Cotton holds his own, and both England and New England are forced to acknowledge his sway. In the meanwhile, our people have an excellent opportunity of making themselves rich and independent. Money is flowing stendily into the cotton States. The surplus capital is already large. It cannot be invested in negroes, and of land there is more than enough? Where, then, can it be applied to more advantage than in the manufacture of cotton? In case has a well-managed cotton mill been unprofitable, and we can lay our finger upon a dozen which are earning large dividends. The Southern mill can make money when it sells yarns at the price which they cost to manufacture in New England. The risk is small and the gain is great; not only in hard money, but in the opening of new channels of industry, in giving enlarged opportunities of employment to the people, and in keeping in the country the money which now slips into the pocket of the Northerner and foreigner.

The subject is well worthy of practical attention, and we hope that our people, not thinking too long, will be convinced of the wisdom of beginning at once the great work of making South Carolina an important manufacturing State. *

The State Fair.

The advices from the interior of the State are now very encouraging, and indicate that preparations are making on all sides for a visit to Columbia during the State Fair, Columbia has entered fully into the spirit of the occasion. The fair grounds will be convenient and complete in every particular, and, besides the Fair proper, there is to be a grand tournament and a winding-up ball. From the middle and upper counties the exhibition of articles will generally be good, and Charleston is expected to send forward choice specimens of the mechanical ingenuity of her citizens. Already arrangements are making for a perfect jam at the State capital, and there is every prospect that for a few days Columbia will be overrun with the good people of the State. . .

In the supplement which we issue this morning will be found the list of premiums to be awarded at the Fair, and other information of interest-to exhibitors. Every department of industry and production has its representation; and it must be borne in mind that our merchants and dealers can, if they choose, send any of their leading articles to the fair for exhibition. Only the productions of the State can compete for the premiums; but articles of foreign and North orn make or production may be exhibited, All articles going to the Fair are carried friends, who mistook his open mouth and weeks and months in writing a tribute to State, and visitors will be taken both ways her faulty, dead lover, was, perhaps, en-
